

Is the death penalty inevitable in human society?

I believe that the death penalty is not inevitable in human society. I have three reasons to support my opinion.

Firstly, there are lots of methods that can be used. Most countries have jails to hold in those who commit crimes. Other countries go to extreme methods such as some countries in the Middle East that cut off hands to prevent thieves from stealing again.

Secondly, the death penalty was not always a part of human history. Some tribes would leave those that were evil or committed crimes alone and leave without that person. Some tribes would try to heal the person then welcome them back into the tribe.

Lastly, I don't believe in that logic. It would be better to heal that person than kill them. If we believe in the logic of a life for a life then it can be the same as saying a war for a war. At the end, both countries lose a lot of life and also face a lot of destruction. It is the same if the death penalty occurs. Their loved ones feel the pain and might cause trouble for others.

For all the above reasons, I believe that the death penalty is not inevitable in human society.

By weknow communication adviser, Shana \(USA\)